Sabbath Observers Can Be Counted On Fingers, Says Orthodox Rabbi

Orthodox rabbinic leaders deplored what they said was the failure "of a great number of American Jews" to take advantage of the significance of the Sabbath "and of the spiritual wealth which it offers." The Sabbath, known as Shabbos (Hebrew for "rest"), is a cardinal principle in Jewish religious life, says Irving Spiegel, in the New York Times. For Jews, the Sabbath is that time of the week devoted to prayer, meditation, and study, closer family relations, and when the home, in an important sense, serves as a sanctuary.

Its holiness is recorded in the Fourth Commandment of the Decalogue. The Jewish Sabbath begins on Friday at sundown and ends on Saturday when darkness sets in.

Scholarly papers and discourses dealing with this sacred theme were delivered by the rabbis, at the Waldman Hotel, in Miami Beach, Florida, representing various sections of the country, at the twenty-sixth annual convention of the Rabbinical Council of America, the largest Orthodox rabbinic body in the U.S.

The Orthodox rabbinic leaders agreed that the "Sabbath does not merely mean a day of rest in the recreational sense, but rather the specific day designed by God when man dwells upon His Divine attributes and strives for spiritual fulfillment."

Rabbi Zalman I. Posner, religious leader of Congregation Sherith Israel, of Nashville, Tenn., asserted that the rabbi must be "specific, concrete, and above all, relevant" in conveying the meaning of the Sabbath to the congregants.

Rabbi Posner stressed that the distinctiveness of the Sabbath "is the ability and willingness of man to adhere to the demands of a higher being and to subordinate his basic impulses to the moral dictates of a religiously based way of living and outlook."

Rabbi Posner also deplored current discussion over the revival of religion, asserting that the growing membership rolls of synagogues could not reflect any religious upsurge unless the members are made to feel the stimulation, vigor, and inspiration of religious teachings and values in their personal lives."

In another paper, Rabbi David S. Shapiro, religious leader of Congregation Tifereth Israel Anshe Sfard, of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, said that Sabbath observers "in any community can be counted on the fingers, while the dietary laws are percentage-wise observed to a far greater extent, not to speak of Rosh Hashonah and Yom Kippur, which fortunately serve for Jews as symbols of identification."

Rabbi Irving Filler, of the Ocean View Jewish Center of Brooklyn, N. Y., pleaded for "less preaching but more teaching and deeper understanding of our sacred rabbinic literature." He said that such a practice "will abolish the great confusion in genuine Judaism and will convince Jewry to accept an original faith and heritage."

N. Y. Hospital Interne And Doctor Pay To Be Highest In City

Montefiore Hospital announced it would double the salaries it is paying to internes and resident doctors. The new salary scale goes into effect this month, and will be completed by 1964. It will raise interne pay to $4,000 a year, and residents' to a high of $6,250, says the New York Times, making it the highest salary scale of its type in New York.

Internes are usually newly graduated doctors who are spending a year in a hospital working with patients. Residents have completed internship and are usually training for two to four years in their specialized fields of medicine, including surgery.

The city's municipal hospitals pay their chief residents $4,800 a year. In announcing the new salary scale for Montefiore, Victor S. Riesenfeld, president of the hospital, said it was designed to "help eliminate the added burden of very low wages to the already rigorous demands of post-graduate medical training.

"This change is being made because we believe it is time for a break with tradition," he added. "In the interest of fairness to young doctors and the society they will serve, house staff salaries must be made commensurate with their skills, training, and high purpose."

The new schedule will increase the salary of internes from $1,920 to $3,000 in July; to $3,500 in 1963; and to $4,000 in 1964.

Residents will have their base starting salary of $2,580 for the first year increased to $3,750 in July; to $4,000 in 1963; and to $4,500 in 1964. Second, third and fourth year residents will receive comparable increases, and in 1964 will be earning $5,000; $5,500; and $6,000, respectively.

Chief residents, now earning $3,540, will receive $5,000 in July; $5,500 in 1963; and $6,250 in 1964.

Under the new schedule, the present monthly $30 allowance for living off the hospital grounds will be discontinued, says the New York Times. However, a new apartment house, built on the hospital grounds and scheduled for completion in 1963, will offer married internes and residents reasonably priced, convenient living quarters. Housing is provided in the hospital for unmarried residents and internes at a charge of $30 a month.

Montefiore Hospital is at 210th Street and Bainbridge Avenue, the Bronx. It has 192 internes and residents in training during the current year.

Decline In Citrus Yields, Competition, Common Market, Face Israelis As Serious Problem

The citrus growers in Israel are facing a serious industry-wide problem of planning for a highly uncertain future.

A steady decline in the yield of Israeli plantations, growing competition abroad and the looming barriers of the European Common Market combine to give the Israelis cause for concern, writes Lawrence Fellowes, in the New York Times. They probably will never have to worry about finding customers for the mainstay of their citrus crop, the Shamouti variety of orange — better known as the Jaffa. The problem is the price it will bring.

Since 1952, when the Israeli Government began to finance new plantings and to make water available for citrus growers, more than 50,000 acres of new citrus groves have been planted.

But not all of these trees have begun to bear fruit. The Jaffa orange is not borne for four or five years after planting, and then not abundantly enough to be profitable for three more years.

Most of Israel's citrus crop still comes from the 28,000 acres of groves that existed when the state was created in 1948. Some were inherited from Arabs who fled or were driven from the land during the fighting between Israel and the Arab states. Probably many more groves, both Jewish and Arab, were ruined during the fighting.

The problem of aging groves has been creeping up on Israel — and Palestine before it — since before World War II, when citrus growers began worrying about events in the European countries that provided their main markets.

In 1930 more than 15,000,000 crates of citrus products were exported from the groves that are producing now. By 1948 exports had dropped to 10,000,000 crates. Last year only 8,000,000 crates were exported.

With young groves coming into production, the export figure in the season just ended went up to 8,500,000 crates.

Next year, barring unusually severe hailstorms of nature, the figure is expected to climb to 12,000,000 crates, and the Israeli growers have begun to worry about whether they should continue with new plantings, says the New York Times. Spain, Israel's biggest competitor, will soon be producing 40,000,000 crates of citrus products yearly. She is expanding her plantations in the south where, as in Israel, they will be free of frost.

Morocco, Tunisia, and Algeria are also big producers of citrus, but France has always been their traditional market. And France shows no inclination to change.

Israel exported citrus this year to twenty-seven countries, but her only traditional market and her best customer remains Britain, which usually takes 40 per cent of what Israel has to sell, and this year took about 50 per cent. Well over half of Britain's imports of citrus have been from Israel.

The Scandinavian countries took about 25 per cent of Israel's citrus crop. The Common Market countries took another 25 per cent, so the tariff wall they are building around themselves will affect Israel directly.

Worse, from Israel's point of view, is the double blow of Britain's expected membership in the Common Market and Spain's association with it. Israel has asked the Common Market countries for talks in hope of getting agreements that will permit Israel to continue to sell her citrus crop without disadvantage to Common Market countries.

The talks are not getting started with any speed, largely because Israel, in spite of her declared intention to liberalize her economy, has not yet lifted the restrictions against imports of European goods into Israel. The Israeli citrus growers have been vociferously pointing this out.

The growers also have been looking around for possible new markets for their fruit, something they have not had to do before. They sold 100,000 crates in Canada this year, and small amounts in Africa and the Far East. They are trying to get into the markets in Australia and New Zealand during the off-season there.

They hope to sell citrus through agreements with the countries of Eastern Europe. A delegation of Israelis returned in spring from the Soviet Union where they tried to barter Israeli citrus products for Russian crude oil, says the New York Times. They were unsuccessful.

Israel sold a trial consignment of 10,000 crates of Jaffas in the United States this year, and will send another next year. But she knows she cannot compete in price with the big producers in the United States.

Noted Woman Lawyer Helped Raise Soblen Bail

The $100,000 forfeited to the Federal court after Dr. Robert A. Soblen fled to Israel and jumped bail, represented $40,000 raised by his wife through pledging her savings, insurance, and pension rights, and $60,000 lent to her by two well-to-do New Yorkers with a concern for civil liberties, says the New York Times. Mrs. Helen Lehman Buttenwieser, member of a law firm whose counsel, Ephraim S. London, represented Dr. Soblen on appeal, told the story in a joint press conference with Mr. London at their law offices, 1 East Forty-fourth Street.

Mrs. Buttenwieser is a niece of Herbert H. Lehman, former Governor of New York; and ex-Senator; and the wife of Benjamin J. Buttenwieser, a partner in the banking firm of Kuhn, Loeb & Company, and a former United States Assistant High Commissioner in Germany. She was the first woman ever elected as a trustee of a commercial bank, the Title Guarantee and Trust Co. That was in 1949.

Both called his flight "dishonorable," Mr. London said the reaction of the fugitive's wife, Dr. Dina Soble, who spells her name differently, was one of "complete despair." But Mrs. Buttenwieser said the experience "would not discourage my belief in other human beings."

She told how she had been approached on the matter by an old friend, George G. Kirstein, publisher of The Nation, a liberal political weekly. As a former executive vice president of Health Insurance Plan of Greater New York, he had worked with Dr. Soblen and had been asked by him for help in finding a bonding agency, Mrs. Buttenwieser said.

She said that her office had tried eight private bondsmen, all of whom refused to handle the case. Feeling that an accused person's civil rights were affected by this refusal of bail by private agencies, she and Mr. Kirstein agreed to "do something about it."

She said she had lent the accused man's wife $60,000 in Government bonds, with the understanding that Mr. Kirstein would reimburse her for half the amount.

Newswriter Was Honoured As Distinguished Crusader In Health Problems; Never Went To College

Albert Deutsch, aged fifty-five years, pioneer in U.S. newspaper reporting of mental health problems, was found dead in bed at Horsham, England, where he went to attend a meeting of the World Federation of Mental Health. He resided in New York.

Albert Deutsch, honoured in 1947 by the American Newspaper Guild as the "most distinguished and efficient humanitarian (now) crusading in American journalism," wrote about people subjected to unnecessary suffering.

"I'm not a crusader," he once said, "I'm just against evil things that don't have to be."

The book with which he perhaps achieved the most far-reaching results was "The Shame of the States," published in 1948, says the New York Herald Tribune. It described the inhuman conditions in many mental institutions. Numerous reforms followed its publication.

In 1949 Mr. Deutsch left "PM" to write first for the "New York Post," and then for "The New York Star," and "The Daily Compass." The following year he became a free-lance writer.

His newspaper columns and numerous books occasionally resulted in social reform.

Mr. Deutsch in 1941 began to write a column about health and welfare matters in the defunct New York City newspaper "PM." It was the first column of its kind to be printed in any American newspaper.

As a result of a series of columns he wrote in 1945 about the poor conditions prevailing in veterans' hospitals, Mr. Deutsch was called to Washington by the House Veterans Committee and cited for contempt of Congress because he refused to divulge his sources.

The citation was eventually rescinded. The Veterans Administration subsequently corrected many of the inadequacies Mr. Deutsch had written about.

Before entering the newspaper business Mr. Deutsch had worked in the New York Department of Social Welfare. His first book, "The Mentally Ill in America; A History of Their Care and Treatment From Colonial Times," is a standard work on the subject.

His other books included, "Our Rejected Children," a study of conditions in state institutions for delinquent boys and girls, and "The Trouble With Cops."

At the time of his death Mr. Deutsch was engaged in preparing an extensive survey of psychiatric research in the United States.

Fashion Industry Story Is Mink And Other Furs; "Good" Cloth Coats And Suits

American makers of higher-priced furs and coats, reported in New York that orders were brisk. There was general agreement that buyers were enthusiastic. Some manufacturers were pleasantly surprised to find that the recent drop in the stock market had not appeared to affect the buying plans of stores across the nation.

"Our bookings are up to last year's figures," reportad Michael Forrest, executive vice president of Coopchik-Forrest, Inc., a New York fur-manufacturing concern, to the New York Times. "Frankly," he added, "we weren't that optimistic, since we thought that the market break might affect our sales, much of which are in the $3,500-to-$4,500 range. But, nationally speaking, the market didn't have as much effect as it did in New York."

Lawrence Carmel, president of George Carmel, Inc., which makes coats and suits selling at retail from $175, noted that while stores "were not ignoring the stock market, they don't feel it will have any immediate effect on sales. No one has been cutting back on orders," he said.

Mr. Carmel reported that buyers were showing "strong enthusiasm" for the coat-and-suit market in general.

This year, the New York Coat and Suit Association, which represents the industry there, designated June as a co-ordinated market month for the showing of fall collections.

Joseph L. Dubow, executive director of the association, said that he was "gratified" at buyer response. "Buyers have come here in very satisfactory numbers," he observed, "and appear to be staying a bit longer." He noted that the major influx usually came during the second market week.

Owen Hill Alper, vice president of Dexonaire, Inc., a manufacturer of junior coats, reported buyers' reaction to be "bullish," with particular emphasis on fur-trim garments. "The fashion industry is in the middle of a coat cycle," he observed. "It's become a fashion status symbol to own a good cloth coat, and for this reason fall '62 business should be excellent."

A. L. Meltzer, president of the Evans Fur Company, one of the world's largest fur retailers, predicted a 20 per cent increase in his company's sales, says the New York Times. "The recent happenings in the stock market are not, in my opinion, going to forestall consumer buying of furs," he said. "Furs no longer are considered a luxury; they are a necessary part of a woman's wardrobe."

According to Mr. Forrest of Coopchik-Forrest, "the big industry story is the re-emergence of mink to a more dominant position in the fur market." He predicted that mink would account for 30 per cent of all fur sales next season, a sharp gain over the 25 per cent last year.

The breeding of new colors and the development of new processes of tanning and dressing that make mink coats much lighter in weight have stimulated new demand, he said.

However, Mr. Meltzer, whose company operates a large head-quarters store in Chicago, and leased departments in a number of department stores across the U.S. believed, says the New York Times, that furs other than mink would increase their share of the market.

Gerontology In Ancient Times: The Status Of Old Age Was Important

BY DR. ASHER GOLDSTEIN, OF TEL AVIV, ISRAEL

In ancient times old folks were generally regarded as an extreme burden, and suicide was as common among them as among Eskimos. There were, of course, important exceptions. The ancient Egyptians exhorted the son to be attentive to his parents. "Double the portion of bread to your mother," they said, "and carry her as she carried you when you were in her womb and when you were breast-fed." Many Egyptian graves bear the epitaph that the deceased helped and protected the aged. Solon, the law-giver, claimed it is worthwhile to live eighty years when there are no sicknesses and miseries. Plato recognized a moral obligation towards the aged. The Elders of Athens were honored. Chinese civilization had a positive attitude to old age; this is especially true of Confucianism. But Buddhism reviewed old age with a melancholy gaze.

As a rule, however, the Greeks scorned old age. Homer puts into the mouth of Aphrodite (the goddess of beauty and love) the saying that even the gods hate old age. Greek elegies treat youth as a blessing and old age as a disaster. Tithonus beloved by Eos (Aurora) saw in the lengthened days a curse. The Spartans exterminated not only feeble children but also disabled people. The Romans regarded old age with contempt and without charity; those who reach sixty, the saying went, should be thrown over the bridge.

The Talmudic maxims, "Youth is a crown of roses and old age is a crown of thorns," and "A grandfather in the house, trouble in the house," are possibly related to Greek influence. But these are isolated maxims. When Rabbi Eliezer ben Azaria was chosen to preside over the Beth Din, his wife had misgivings. "You have no white hair," she said, "and it is becoming for an old man to preside." To the august Sanhedrin only men with an impressive appearance and hoary age were appointed. According to Hippocrates, old age begins at sixty-six; but Rabbi Yehuda ben Teyma put it at sixty.

The Torah says, "Before old age arise and honor the face of the elder." That it takes an exalted view of old age can be seen from the following verses: "A nation of fierce countenance, which shall not regard the person of the old, nor show favor to the young" (Deuteromy, 28-50); and "I will give children to be their princes, and babes shall rule over them" (Isaiah, 3-4); "The faces of the elders were not honored" (Lamentations, 5-12). The Talmud enjoins that not only elders and scholars must be respected but also old men who are sinners. The old man was generally identified with scholarship. Yosi the Galilean says: "Who is an old man? One who has acquired wisdom."

But often a man was regarded as wise who was old in years. Thus we find the saying: "In old men there is wisdom, and in the length of days there is understanding." (Job, 12-12). The honouring of one's parents, according to Judaism, leads to a long life; and this moral commandment is the basis for Jewish gerontology. The Midrash asks why is it that the commandment, "Honor thy father and mother", is followed by the commandment, "Thou shalt not kill." The answer given is that anyone who has food in his house and does not share it with his parents is like a murderer in the eyes of God.

Sons and daughters are required not only to take care of the material needs of their parents, but also, to display a respectful attitude towards them. A son, the Talmud says, must not give his father unprepossessing or indigestible food; he must also be tactful and diplomatic; when the father makes an error, the son should give a hint and avoid bluntness. The Talmud relates that a heathen in Ashkelon had goods in the value of sixty thousand coins, and that the key to the goods was placed under his father's pillow. The sages came to the heathen and desired to buy the goods at a profitable price. But since his father was asleep at the time, the heathen would not wake him up out of filial respect, and thus the deal was not consummated.

When Rabbi Yoseph heard the footsteps of his mother, he used to say, "The Shechina (the Holy Spirit) is coming, and I must stand up." Honoring one's parents was regarded as one of the things in which a man gets his "dividends" in this world and the "principal" in the next world. There are many Talmudic sayings on the important status of old age; "God himself is supposed to do honor to old men"; "Israel survives when led by its elders"; "If the elders had not accepted the words of Moses, the entire people of Israel would have not accepted them"; "A bird needs wings to fly, Israel needs the elders to sustain it."

Maimonides also stresses the importance of the commandment enjoining honor and reverence for parents; and in his medical work he was much concerned about the welfare and health of the aged. He advises the aged as follows: Refrain from emotional excitement because it is the cause of faintness and excessive sweat. When you are in a feeble state eat small meals and frequently; when your condition improves, you may eat more and less frequently. Eat well baked bread, and drink milk only if it agrees with you. Eat soft figs in the summer, and dried figs in the autumn. Before eating, partake of sweet wine to help the digestion.

After the meal, partake of certain foods to strengthen the duodenum. Refrain from excessive bathing and sharp and spicy food. You cannot avoid the aging process, but by a sensible diet, proper sleeping habits, short walks, you can slow it down. Evacuate regularly. Avoid violent exercises; moderate exercises promote better blood circulation. Do not remain stationary for long periods. The eating of honey and the drinking of wine are recommended, but not fish, particularly to those who do not relish it. Avoid sexual intercourse which is harmful to the aged.

Warns Jewry To Get Ready For Long Pull Aid To Israel

The immigration and rehabilitation program of the Jewish Agency for Israel, major beneficiary of the nation-wide United Jewish Appeal, is facing its most crucial test in a decade, it was reported in New York by Dr. Isadore Lubin, noted American economist and consultant to the Jewish Agency for Israel, Inc.; and Aryeh L. Pincus, treasurer of the Jewish Agency, in Jerusalem. Mr. Pincus came to New York for consultation with UJA leaders on problems of financing the resettlement of an increasing number of immigrants. Dr. Lubin just returned from a survey trip to Israel. Both reported to the board of directors of the Jewish Agency for Israel, Inc., at headquarters, 515 Park Avenue.

Among the factors which precipitate the current critical situation, are the continued increase in the tempo of immigration, the shortage of housing for new arrivals, and the age composition, family size, and health status of the immigrants.

"At the same time that Israel is trying to put its economy on a sound and more competitive basis, this rising tide of immigration is creating new inflationary pressures and new strains on the country's economic resources", Dr. Lubin noted. He said that this apparent contradiction between Israel's economic policy and its immigration policies could be explained only by the young nation's determination to give priority to the rescue of Jewish lives.

"This is not a one-time crisis that will resolve itself by the end of the fiscal year", Mr. Pincus said. "From what we know about conditions in a number of countries from where Jewish communities are on the move, it appears that we are in for a hard, long, and steady pull which may extend over the next three or four years. Though what we face is by any definition an emergency, we cannot approach it with the traditional emergency campaign psychology. We must get set for a sustained top level effort for a long time to come."

Dr. Lubin reported that broad efforts are being made to curtail certain types of construction for the settled population in order to accelerate the immigrant housing program. "Anyone familiar with the difficult housing problems of the resident population of Israel and especially of the young married couples will realize what sacrifices such a step must entail," he said.

He said that while the general employment situation in Israel is very satisfactory, the continued influx of unskilled, elderly, and handicapped immigrants might possibly lead, at a later period, to its own unemployment problem. Even in a country with a high rate of economic growth and labor shortages in certain parts of the economy, there is a limit to the type of jobs which these newcomers can fill. Thus, shortages of labor in the general economy go hand in hand with the need to create jobs for large numbers of people with limited working skills and capacity.

"In the health field, it appears that the constituent agencies of the UJA, the Jewish Agency and JDC-Malben, might be right back where they left off a few years ago," Dr. Lubin reported. As examples, he cited incidents of TB and trachoma which had been drastically reduced thanks to the efforts of JDC-Malben but which again are found in an increasing amount among the new arrivals.

Mr. Pincus said that he sometimes felt American Jewry has come to take the great epic of mass immigration for granted. "But the possible, to its utmost and sacrificial limits, we must also ask from American Jewry. These immigrants who must leave their countries of residence for no other reason than for their being Jews are the responsibility of world Jewry as much as they are that of Israel."

Congress Convention Hears The Case For Government Support Of Jewish Day Schools

Dr. Joseph Diamond, of Toronto, Ont., speaking in favor of Government support for Jewish Day Schools, stated that in Ontario day schools have been established and supported by the Jewish community for over 15 years. At the same time he pointed out, "We continue to support by our taxes the denigration of the 'Jewish ideal' and the teaching of the 'Christian ideal' in the 'public' schools. The Catholics, however, are allowed their own taxes for the teaching of their particular 'Christian ideal' in their own separate schools. Accepting Jewish taxes for Christian teaching does not seem to disturb the religious sensibilities of the advocates of religious education in the public schools.

"We are not asking for separate schools." Dr. Diamond declared. "We wish to continue to send the majority of our children to the 'public' schools and to pay our taxes to the 'public' schools, and to hope that some day they will be truly public.

"The need to afford the opportunity to those of our people who are determined to counter-act the Christian influence of the 'public' school to teach their children a more intensive 'Jewish ideal', is a matter of vital importance to the integrity and self-preservation of the Jewish community. We are not asking the government to support the teaching of the 'Jewish ideal'. All we are asking is that part of the cost which the 'public' schools would have to expend on secular education of the same Jewish children if they were attending the 'public' instead of the day schools."

Reviewing the varied educational systems in operation throughout Canada, Dr. Diamond referred to the fact that eight out of the ten Canadian provinces, including Ontario, have tax-supported, separate schools. He suggested that there is no more divisiveness in the eight provinces supporting separate schools than there is in Manitoba and British Colombia which do not support separate schools. He cited the findings of the Manitoba Royal Commission on Education, to the effect that public financing of separate schools has not undermined educational standards or the public school systems.

He also referred to the recent brief submitted by the Canadian Jewish Congress to the Quebec Royal Commission on Education which pointed out that public support of private and parochial schools is held to be right in principle in the United Kingdom.

Dr. Diamond emphasised that "It is only in a democratic country that private and parochial schools are at all permitted. Government support of Jewish day schools will undoubtedly encourage larger enrolment of Jewish children in these schools. However, this will not effect very seriously the enrolment of Jewish children in the public schools. The future of the public schools is very secure, provided they assert their 'public' character by removal of religious education from their program, and provided they do not depend upon a student body held captive by the refusal of government support to private schools which they might otherwise attend."

Saul Cherniak, of Winnipeg, summarizing the views of those who are opposed to Government grants to Jewish day schools, referred to the intense "emotional involvement" in this problem. Mr. Cherniack emphasized the need to "recognize that we are not dealing with grants to Jewish schools alone but to all private schools." He reviewed the present position of Jewish education in Canada which finds a greater proportion of Jewish children attending Jewish schools in evening, all-day, and Sunday programmes than ever before. The cost of this more intensive and wide-spread Jewish education is borne by the parents and by the local Jewish community.

"It is obvious", Mr. Cherniack declared, "that our attitude to Government grants cannot be the same in every province". He cited the situation in Quebec where there is no public school system and Jews are included in the Protestant School system, but where there are also all-day Jewish parochial schools now entitled to Provincial aid. "If I lived in Quebec, I would support grants." In Manitoba, where he lives, there is only one school system without religious education. While the majority attend the public schools the Jewish community also has its own day schools. "We have managed to support our schools without Government aid. The demand for Government school grants can therefore not be called 'Grants for Survival'. Government grants would not be sufficient to maintain the schools and the Jewish communities would still be required to continue their subsidies."

He suggested that the conditions for obtaining contributions for Jewish schools from the community would be adversely affected, based on the excuse that the schools would be receiving Government support and that Jews would be contributing to this support through taxation. Government grants would lead to fragmentation of the public school system, destroying what we now have in Manitoba and creating even greater separation in Quebec. The majority of Jewish students would remain in the public schools. He also pointed out that for Jewish children in small centres it would be impossible to attend a separate Jewish school in any event.

Referring to the Manitoba Royal Commission on Education which recommended grants to private schools, Mr. Cherniack explained that the Commission also recommended religious education in the schools and made the point that grants would make it more feasible to provide religious education in the public schools. In this event, the speaker suggested, Jewish students remaining in the public schools would be subjected to Christian religious education or to the need to segregate themselves from certain portions of the daily curriculum.

Mr. Cherniack warned that if the principle of grants to all private schools were accepted, it could lead to ten, twenty, or thirty separate school systems for each of the ethnic, religious, or political groups. Each province must be judged separately and there cannot be a national policy on this question. "The destruction of the all-inclusive school system we now have in Manitoba, augmented as it is with our present Jewish educational system, would be an irreparable loss to the cause of achieving for the Jew a positive role in Canadian life."

NOTED WOMAN LAWYER

She agreed that his flight would make things harder for others seeking bail. Calling his action "very dishonorable," she said, "He had an obligation to turn himself in at the proper time." But she said she was "ready to take the risk again under the same circumstances."

She said that the present bail system had shown that there was no relation between the amount of bail and the question why some absconded and some did not. She said it was a matter of "roots and character rather than financial ability." Under the present system she said, it was the poor who had to stay in jail.

Mrs. Buttenwieser, a member of the New York bar for twenty-five years, recalled that she had been interested in civil liberties "all my working life." She cited her membership and activity in the New York Civil Liberties Union and the Legal Aid Society, says the New York Times. She was a stanch supporter of Alger Hiss during his trials for perjury and represented him this spring when he sought to reopen the case on the basis of what was offered as new evidence. The Department of Justice said these claims could not be sustained.

Alger Hiss is the former State Department official convicted of perjury in denying he passed secret government documents to a spy for Russia. Hiss had taught one of her sons and during his trial one of his sons lived at her home.

Mrs. Buttenwieser is a trustee of Connecticut College, New London, and lives at 450E. 52d Street. In 1939, she became the first woman ever to receive the chairmanship of a standing committee in the New York County Bar Association, says the New York Times. She was graduated from New York University Law School in 1936.
